several hydrological experts, including Boettcher (fmu), would go to West Germany to discuss with authorities in West Germany a large-scale canalization project for the Elbe River, which included the construction of 26 locks. He said that the project was necessary because of the difficult drinking water situation in East Germany. He admitted that it was impossible to carry out the project without financial aid by, and material supplies from, West Germany. He added that the drafts for the project would be completed by 1954 and that model experiments were under way at the research institutes of the State Secretariat, Shipping.
